

Philip Ellis, PhD

Philip Ellis joined the Congressional Budget Office in 2002 and is currently a Senior Analyst. He was the author of CBO's December 2007 report on the comparative effectiveness of medical treatments, and recently co-authored (with Peter Orszag) two pieces in the New England Journal of Medicine related to that topic. His other work has spanned a variety of health care topics including the Medicare drug benefit, disease management, and the Medicaid program, and in 2006 he completed a report on consumer-directed health plans and their potential effects on health spending and outcomes. Prior to joining CBO, he worked on Medicare reform and other health care issues at the Treasury Department and in the office of the Assistant Secretary for Planning and Evaluation at the Department of Health and Human Services. He received his undergraduate degree from Stanford University and holds a Master's degree in public policy from Harvard and a Ph.D. in economics from MIT.
